Faith, academic freedom can co-exist for universities

Does faith preclude academic freedom? This question strikes at the very heart of the mission of many small colleges and universities, and aroused one of the liveliest discussions for the leading administrators of these institutions who attended a three-day symposium Jan. 13 - 15.

The symposium of The Role of Small Colleges in Canadian Higher Education — Past, Present and Future was sponsored by St. Thomas More College as part of its 50th anniversary celebrations. It attracted 25 delegates from colleges and universities across Canada.

Though these colleges are members of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC), the perspective of the larger institution dominates. "This is the first opportunity for smaller colleges to discuss together their relationship with the larger university, the church and society at large," said Father James Hanrahan, CSB, symposium organizer.

Academic freedom vs faith

Although the majority of delegates represented Catholic institutions, about six were from colleges serving other religious affiliations.

The discussion on academic freedom and faith sprang from the experience of one such group, Trinity Western University.

When the university sought membership in the AUCC it was challenged and forced to justify itself on this precise point.

Dr. Neil Snider, president of Trinity Western, responded to the question by saying, "Those of us who have stated religious commitments for our institutions are aware of the outstanding achievements of these academic enterprises.

Freedom and commitment

"We can be encouraged, can take heart and maybe drop some of our fear and self-consciousness in the presence of those who oppose our affirmations to legitimately hold such commitments."

Trinity Western University has developed an academic freedom statement which rejects arbitrary indoctrination and simplistic prefabricated answers because these are incompatible with freedom. It also rejects any definition which exclusively requires pluralism without community because it is incompatible with human nature.

Academic freedom, Snider pointed out, allows for some control or authority, including collegial consensus on the part of other scholars.

"Academic freedom does not mean absence of restraint for with it comes responsibility," Snider said. Scholars are responsible for the students and should be careful not to introduce into their teaching controversial matter unrelated to the subject.

Scholars also have a responsibility to the university, and must realize that, when they publish their ideas, they represent the institution in the eyes of the public.

The university employing the scholar also has rights and responsibilities.

Panel examines challenges for colleges

Serious challenges confront colleges across the country, according to a panel of speakers representing Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario and the West. The panel on Jan. 13 was part of a three-day symposium on the Role of Small Colleges in Canadian Higher Education — Past, Present and Future.

The Jan. 13 - 15 symposium was sponsored by St. Thomas More College.

The value of the college was reaffirmed. "I am naive enough to believe that what we do is worth doing," stated Father Norman Choate, CR, president of the University of St. Jerome's College.

Dr. David Lawless, rector of St. Paul's College, Winnipeg said he is convinced that small denominational colleges play an important role both within society as a whole and in the university proper. They provide a clear and unequivocal expression of values, Choate said.

Times are changing

However, developments over the past 30 years for both the independent college and the affiliated college have led to some serious problems.

The Atlantic Provinces have 15 universities and four colleges serving a population of two million. This small, economically disadvantaged territory has consistently respected minority groups, said Father Gregory MacKinnon, president of St. Francis Xavier University. But pressure is not being felt to move from the pattern of small colleges and universities to a larger university model.

Already church-related institutions have become somewhat secularized, said MacKinnon, and the struggle between the government's demand for accountability and the university's desire for autonomy indicates that the ability to preserve the unique religious atmosphere may be further eroded.

Dr. Sean McEvenue, the first principal of Lonergan College which is affiliated with the University of Montreal, described the situation "as a large university of 23,000 united by a computer."

Two-thirds of the courses must be taken within a specialized field. The colleges, therefore, are left to function within the remaining one-third of elective courses.

Deal with real questions

Colleges must confront the problems of secularization in what McEvenue describes as a "post-Christian era." They must counter the isolationism inherent in specialization and encourage their students to deal with real questions.

Ontario is currently facing a steady decline in the level of funding for higher education. Colleges do not qualify for the earmarked funding which the government is providing to compensate, said Choate.

Ontario colleges also have no access to the decision-making process. As a result, the university has developed procedures and policies which ignore the colleges and their needs.

The West is also in a difficult situation because of size, infrastructure and financing, said Lawless. Colleges tend to be small, between 300 and 1,000 full-time students. The infrastructure is also small and inadequate for current problems involving fund-raising and public relations.

Where do we go now?

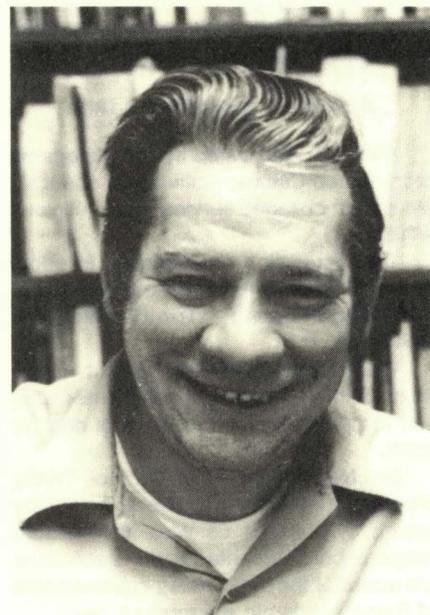

Financing has become a major issue. Colleges failed to establish financial procedures to meet expansion of services and capital construction. They were too dependent on the salary of religious which would often go back into the operating budget. Now that there are fewer religious, colleges have to find other sources of revenue.

The spirit of the panel was not one of depression but of optimism. Lawless encouraged colleges to re-examine their commitment and to rekindle their energy to discover new ways to face current problems. Choate challenged them to do this by using both imagination and negotiation.

Basilian Fathers' Missions

Father Bob O'Halloran, CSB, a native of Rochester, New York, has been ordained for 26 years. Following his undergraduate and theological studies he was appointed to Andrean High School in Merrillville, Indiana where he combined teaching with coaching for seven years. He also served as Assistant Principal for six years. In 1968 he was named Dean of Student Affairs at St. John Fisher College in up-state New York, a post he filled for five years. While serving as Dean, he was elected Regional Representative (Provincial) for the Eastern United States for a four-year term. On the conclusion of his term he was appointed Newman Chaplain at the University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, in Western Canada. While there he was also the Superior of St. Thomas More College for two three-year terms. Since 1983, he has been the Mission Procurator of the Basilian Fathers and currently resides in Sugar Land, Texas.

University finds that women have unique needs

Post-secondary institutions should recognize the unique demands of women who are seeking higher education in ever-increasing numbers, according to Dr. Naomi Hersom.

Hersom was one of two women out of 25 delegates present at a symposium on the role of small colleges in Canadian higher education.

Speaking as part of a panel on Colleges and their Constituencies, Hersom said schools "must become user-friendly to that half of the population that is made up of people who seldom have the luxury of being expected to attend colleges or universities." The number of Canadian women registered in these institutions has increased by six per cent since 1980.

School administrators need a better grasp of women's concerns, Hersom said. They need to rethink how women's needs can best be met in their institutions.

Hersom pointed out that present administrative procedures are based on the male student whom society expects to give sustained, concentrated attention to studies.

Hersom, formerly dean of education at the University of Saskatchewan, is currently president of Mount St. Vincent University (the Mount) in Halifax. The Mount was established as a women's college run by sisters. Although it is now co-educational, 83 per cent of the 4,000 students are women.

Hersom showed how the Mount has actively addressed four major aspects of university policy and practice in relation to women.

The Mount offers a basic core of liberal arts with a science component. Programs are offered which support opportunities for women in both the traditional and the newly expanding work fields. Specific classes in Women Studies are also being introduced.

In an effort to make classes available for women who are homebound or geographically distant, the Mount offers credit courses late in the day, in the evening and during the summer term. It is involved in live-class broadcasting and is currently investigating the use of satellite for expanding communication.

New means of financial assistance are being sought for women who receive little family encouragement and support. Special counselling, group experiences and follow-up are provided to deal with various social problems and a significant feeling of lack of confidence.

Administratively the Mount makes several concessions to its women students.

Their registration timeline is less rigid, enabling women who are unable to establish plans in advance to register at the beginning of the term.

The Mount serves many naval families; it has a greater openness to the transfer of credits for women who have mobile families.

And students are allowed more experimentation before commitment to a specific program. Nor has the Mount any time limit on the amount of time spent on obtaining a degree.

Ann Shore, national Newman chaplain, issued another alert to those present when she spoke on Pastoral Care. As one of a growing number of laywomen serving on chaplaincy teams on college and university campuses, Shore said she feels the need to be more visibly present in a pastoral role at eucharistic liturgies.

"The eucharist has high centrality on Catholic campuses" she pointed out, and it forms the natural model for the campus community. If laywomen are to play a leading pastoral role they must be perceived as present in a special way at liturgical celebrations. "I am not seeking ordination," Shore said, but some form of visible presence should be found.

FROM SMALL TO TALL!
RECALL THE GROWTH!
WE LOVE THEM BOTH!

How much I've heard 'bout "Wee White House."

*I pictured it the size of mouse.
When lo, behold, I found this place
Where S.T.M. first showed its face.
I thought you too would like to see
Where all began for you and me.
'Twas College then, Alumni Dears;
but, how it grew these fifty years!
Turn back the clock to thirty-six.
Now, count the many times it ticks
From thirty-six to eighty-six!
We've come of age from babes to men;*

*And if you can count all that sand
That ran through time for fifty years,
You'll see no doubt some fears and tears.*

*So, fondly look upon our cradle
And try to see if you are able*

*The monumental work achieved
By untold souls who built and believed.
Salute them all who paid a price.
Give thanks to them. That will suffice.
Give thanks to God. He built that house.*

*We work in vain. Naught will remain
Unless He bless, caress, possess.
It's His Abode. In this wee ode
We beg that He will always be Right here to guide and that's our key.
'Twill always be eternally.*

Mrs. Florence Fournier merits award for service to education

Mrs. Florence Fournier was born at Hodgeville, Saskatchewan, to Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Gross, one of 13 children. She was raised and educated there and took her Registered Nurses Training at Regina Grey Nuns Hospital. Florence began her nursing career at Holy Family Hospital in Prince Albert, married J. Albert Fournier and became the mother of six children, all of whom are university graduates today. After only 20 years of marriage, Florence was widowed. She resumed her nursing career in 1966 at Holy Family Hospital, moved to the Associate Medical Clinic and remains there to this day.

Receives Meritorious Service Award

The Catholic Section of the Saskatchewan School Trustees Association honored and rewarded her last November 17 at the Centre of the Arts Building, Prince Albert, for the many contributions she has made throughout the years in the province of Saskatchewan.
